

Safety standards could temper apprehension

Knowing that companies had to meet minimum safety requirements for their driverless cars before selling them to the public would address a large number of respondents' concerns or apprehension about the technology, regardless of generation, region or type of community. Greater than 60% of respondents agreed with this sentiment across all three demographic categories.

